How many parties to spoil a marriage: What's happening with third parties? – Michael Taussig QC and Georgina Presnell
It has been nearly three years since the introduction of Pt VIII AA of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) – providing for orders and injunctions to be made against third parties. After a slow start, the application of this Part of the Act appears to be slowly gathering momentum, as the courts and practitioners come to grips with how to use its provisions. The next five years are likely to reveal whether or not these third party provisions will lead to the much anticipated “revolution” in family law practice; or whether the conditions required for such orders continue to be considered too unpredictable to rely upon.	283
Child support reform – Greg Shoebridge
In 2005 the federal government initiated a Senate inquiry into potential reform of both family law and child support. The resultant report recommended significant reforms to both areas. Those recommendations eventually resulted in Acts amending both the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and the child support legislation. This article examines in some detail those amendments relating to child support. There is commentary on the changes that have already commenced, such as the use of the Social Security Appeals Tribunal for departure hearings; and on those changes which are yet to commence, such as the new formulas for calculating child support.	293
