ARTICLES

Why words matter: The vagaries of language, and the nature of book indexes versus online searches – Part 1 – Glenda Browne

This article is the first of a two-part series examining features of manual indexing, and the ways these features are, or are not, available in purely automatic search systems. The second part (to come in a later issue) will examine features of automatic search engines that are not possible with human indexing. To ensure that users always have the best possible chance of finding what they are looking for, we need to know what methods work best, and in what areas. 191

Spam jujitsu: Disposable email addresses – Jon Jermey

Every day on the web we receive invitations to submit our email addresses and join mailing lists, blogs and other online groups. Some sites can be trusted with an email address, others cannot. By using disposable email addresses users can take back control over what they allow into their inboxes. 199

A feast of manuscripts: An overview of two conferences – Caroline Jones

This is an overview of the papers given and libraries visited during two British conferences for Rare Books Librarians. 202

BONUS Plus: Unmediated online requesting among libraries in three Australian States – Katie Wilson

Seven academic libraries in New South Wales, Victoria and Western Australia are sharing more than two million monograph resources through BONUS Plus, a requesting scheme which allows clients to place requests directly online for material that is not available in their local library. The first unmediated borrowing scheme in Australia, BONUS Plus extends participating library collections and meets short-term needs for material that is on loan. 205
