The digital economy dance: Getting into step with government policy – Paul Bentley
Australian governments have wrestled with the information economy for more than a decade. The Rudd Government is positioning itself for the upcoming tussle, educated by the experience of its predecessors. The Collections Council of Australia, established to lead the collections sector towards a converging future, is still finding its footing as the libraries, archives, galleries and museums work out how best to be part of the action. Where are they up to? Where do they go from here?	13
Why words matter: The vagaries of language, and the nature of book indexes versus online searches – Part 2 – Glenda Browne
This article is the second in a two-part series comparing manual indexing with automated search systems. The first part, (2008) 22 OLC 191, considered the ways that manual indexes and search engines deal with linguistic issues, concluding that there are still things that manual indexes do to aid users that search systems can't do. This article explores tasks that can be done using search engines that are not possible when using manual indexing, and also discusses unstructured tagging (indexing) of the internet by multiple users.	22
Information education: Online resources for the Higher School Certificate and other secondary examinations – Bill Browne
Students of the New South Wales Higher School Certificate are fortunate that significant internet resources are available to them, providing formal and informal information about the HSC examination process and the subjects being studied. Government and non-government organisations have put together sophisticated tools for students (and teachers and parents) to draw upon. Commercial organisations have also assembled websites, but for the most part these do not measure up against free websites, such as Bored of Studies. A more limited number and variety of sites are also available for similar final year exams in other States of Australia and in New Zealand.	27
